The social state gave way to a state that was regarded as enabling, permitting not only the citizen but also the firm, the locality, and so on to freely choose. This politics of choice was in fact shared by the Thatcher’s Conservative administration and Blair’s Labour one. In both the state was seen as a partner. In the so-called Third Way of Blair, one between socialism and the market, the partnership evolved much more in terms of community than in the Conservative case.
