These essays collectively present new perspectives on the history of modern science in China since 1900. Fa-ti Fan describes how science under the Republic of China after 1911 exhibited a complex local and international character that straddled both imperialism and colonialism. Danian Hu focuses on the fate of relativity in the physics community in China after 1917. Taken together, these accounts present us with a comparative history of modern science in China that is both globally and locally informed. Do you want to read the rest of this article?
